

Take your relationship therapy to the next level: Learn the Core Skills & Theory of the Developmental Model

Whether you work with couples or individuals, you probably spend a lot of clinical time talking about relationships.

Developmental Model Core Skills and Theory is an introduction to the most broad-reaching model of relationship therapy we know. This training offers a clinical framework that integrates Attachment, Differentiation, and Neurobiological theory into a practical and approachable methodology that clarifies the complexity of relationships for therapist and client alike. This comprehensive introduction to the model is taught in two blocks of two days, plus a one-day online review session in between to assist your integration.

Whether you work primarily with individuals or couples, this in-depth perspective on how relationships operate has something for you. You also have the chance to join our growing community of developmental model therapists with access to free information, further training, consultation and support.

The training is organised in two blocks of two days in-person training in Auckland, three months apart, with an online day in the middle to review and consolidate your learning. The first block (running on 13 & 14 May) focuses more on introducing the model and core skills while the second block (26 & 27 August) is focused on the application of the model to cases, including common challenging presentations.

The online review day is 17 June. This is an opportunity to consolidate your learning from block one by exploring practical applications with real cases as well as asking any questions you might have.

It is expected that you will have completed our foundational training in Working with Couples WWC first or have equivalent training or experience. If you have not completed this, talk to us as we are willing to be flexible and hold a place for you if required for the WWC course later this year.

Over the past 6 years, participants have consistently rated our training courses 4.8 out of 5 for overall value and impact so you can be sure your time and money will be well spent.

Trainers: Paula Dennan and Nic Beets are both Clinical Psychologists who each have over 30 years' experience in working with relationship issues in various models. They are the only endorsed trainers in Australasia for the Developmental Model.
